

I Love Museums

I love museums. I tend to go in, get lost, and have to be dragged out by my kids. They like museums too, but they aren't as enamored of the past as I am. At my age I tend to relish the way things were, but it's not that way with my kids. They've learned to reverence the past without reversing the future. They're tuned in to technology's best. They appreciate the days gone by, but they know the future should be the focus of their attention.

Paul recognized the same thing, even in Bible days. In the letter to the Philippians he says, "I'm not everything I ought to be, but I'm working on it. So, forgetting past successes and failures, I look ahead, and I keep on track."¹

We all have things we need to lay aside, some are our successes, others are our failures. But God promises a fresh start for those who put their trust in Him.
