

WEEK FIVE

ROMANS 8:38-39

Nothing Can Separate
Us from God's Love

ASK
THIS

How would you live if you believed what God
says is true?

WEEK FIVE

ROMANS 8:38-39

Nothing Can Separate
Us from God's Love

ASK
THIS

How would you live if you believed what God
says is true?

DO THIS

MEAL TIME

Make up a family handshake or special high-five that you can use to encourage each other this month.

DO THIS

MEAL TIME

Make up a family handshake or special high-five that you can use to encourage each other this month.

REMEMBER THIS

"Being confident of this, that he who began a good work in you will carry it on to completion until the day of Christ Jesus."
Philippians 1:6, NIV

LIFE
APP

CONFIDENCE—Living like you believe what God says is true

REMEMBER THIS

"Being confident of this, that he who began a good work in you will carry it on to completion until the day of Christ Jesus."
Philippians 1:6, NIV

LIFE
APP

CONFIDENCE—Living like you believe
what God says is true

WHAT YOU SHOULD BE STRIVING FOR AS A PARENT

By Jeff Brodie

There are no perfect parents, and there are no perfect kids. So what is the ideal family? What should be our goal?

When I look at my family, there is a tension between what is real and what is ideal. While I should be a patient parent, I can find myself making mistakes and pulling my hair out every day. God sets out some great ideals for us as parents. The big question is:

Will I abandon ideals, or lower my standards, just to make me feel better about my parenting?

OR

Will I accept that even if I won't be the ideal parent, I need to parent toward ideals?

Here are three ways I find myself lowering my standards as a parent:

1. Quietly judging the parents around me. Sometimes pointing out the mistakes in others is motivated by a need to make us feel better about ourselves. We can find ourselves judging, gossiping, or critiquing the parents around us (or their kids) as an escape from focusing on our own need to improve how we lead our own children.

2. Blaming my own parent.

At times, we can find ourselves blaming the past for our parenting mistakes today. We sometimes need to be reminded that the bad habits we inherit are meant to be broken; not to be blamed. Our past shouldn't be an excuse to not parent towards an ideal, but a springboard towards something better.

3. Excusing ordinary situations by calling them extraordinary.

So often my parenting excuses start with claiming that my current situation is an exception to the ideal: "The reason I don't spend time with my kids is because I'm so much busier than everyone else." By claiming our situation is extraordinary gives us an excuse to lower our standards.

So, how do we handle the tension between what's real and what's ideal?

The answer: We take our cues from God who models this for us. One of the mysteries of God is His ability to hold up ideals for me to aim towards, but to hold out His arms with grace because He knows I won't always meet them—all with the goal of seeing me grow in my faith as a person and a parent.

You'll never be a perfect parent, but you can strive for what's best, while understanding that God is ready to forgive and walk alongside you every step of the way.

For more blog posts
and parenting resources, visit:
ParentCue.org

WHAT YOU SHOULD BE STRIVING FOR AS A PARENT

By Jeff Brodie

There are no perfect parents, and there are no perfect kids. So what is the ideal family? What should be our goal?

When I look at my family, there is a tension between what is real and what is ideal. While I should be a patient parent, I can find myself making mistakes and pulling my hair out every day. God sets out some great ideals for us as parents. The big question is:

Will I abandon ideals, or lower my standards, just to make me feel better about my parenting?

OR

Will I accept that even if I won't be the ideal parent, I need to parent toward ideals?

Here are three ways I find myself lowering my standards as a parent:

1. Quietly judging the parents around me. Sometimes pointing out the mistakes in others is motivated by a need to make us feel better about ourselves. We can find ourselves judging, gossiping, or critiquing the parents around us (or their kids) as an escape from focusing on our own need to improve how we lead our own children.

2. Blaming my own parent.

At times, we can find ourselves blaming the past for our parenting mistakes today. We sometimes need to be reminded that the bad habits we inherit are meant to be broken; not to be blamed. Our past shouldn't be an excuse to not parent towards an ideal, but a springboard towards something better.

3. Excusing ordinary situations by calling them extraordinary.

So often my parenting excuses start with claiming that my current situation is an exception to the ideal: "The reason I don't spend time with my kids is because I'm so much busier than everyone else." By claiming our situation is extraordinary gives us an excuse to lower our standards.

So, how do we handle the tension between what's real and what's ideal?

The answer: We take our cues from God who models this for us. One of the mysteries of God is His ability to hold up ideals for me to aim towards, but to hold out His arms with grace because He knows I won't always meet them—all with the goal of seeing me grow in my faith as a person and a parent.

You'll never be a perfect parent, but you can strive for what's best, while understanding that God is ready to forgive and walk alongside you every step of the way.

For more blog posts
and parenting resources, visit:
ParentCue.org